There is no other woman like Roz Pichardo.

More than a domestic and gun violence survivor, Roz Pichardo is a warrior. She heals herself through healing others by serving the often-forgotten people of North Philadelphia.

Hello Sunshine is completely different from any other documentary about the Kensington section of Philadelphia. Rather than focus on the everyday horrors and sadness that exist, the film shines a light on the men and women who live there.

“A lot of people know what they see in the media, but don’t know what the outreach workers do, what community members do,” says Roz Pichardo, who made it her mission to help curb gun violence and help those suffering from addiction. “They don’t know what kind of support systems are here until it’s shown.”

“Roz serves many people in Kensington who are active in their addiction and it’s easy to forget who these people are,” said Joe Quint, the film director for “Hello Sunshine.”
